

Operations review for construction companies

Construction companies looking to increase efficiency could benefit from a Grant Thornton operations review. We can review business processes and procedures to identify opportunities for improvement and recommend a plan to effect positive change.

Grant Thornton advisory service professionals can perform a comprehensive study of your construction company operations to analyze critical processes and suggest ways to streamline workflows and improve productivity. To evaluate the effectiveness of a company's operations, we examine:

- project data workflows
- financial reporting systems
- estimating and bidding procedures
- recruiting and hiring practices
- material procurement processes
- equipment deployment
- new business development

We will recommend ways to address process deficiencies or inefficiencies, guide you toward adopting “best practices” for construction business management, and help you devise a down-to-earth plan for improving processes.

To help you implement new processes in the organization, we will work with both managers and employees to introduce fresh approaches for managing day-to-day functions and raise efficiency levels.

Profitability analyses

In addition to identifying procedures and processes in the organization that offer the potential for improvement, we can perform profitability analyses on work the company performs.

We can analyze projects by job type, industry and construction method to determine whether efficiencies can be achieved through change or focus. We can also help you to determine cost-effective approaches to acquiring, managing and deploying equipment used in construction jobs.
