Navigating enterprise licensing opportunities during COVID-19

Immediate actions to take
Optimizing and right-sizing your enterprise license and cloud spend can free up much-needed liquidity while enabling your organization and workforce with the right tools to have maximum impact. The key is to make appropriate evaluations of on premise and SaaS licensing before making purchasing decisions.

Important actions to take include:
• Rationalizing user profiles by level of access to functionality
• Optimizing licensing metrics (users versus CPU), support levels
• Analyzing contracts to identify unnecessary products / bundles
• Evaluating SaaS usage and adopting optimum usage / pricing models
• Identifying areas of infrastructure optimization
• Determining areas for reducing licensing, compute, storage and network costs in the cloud

The COVID-19 crisis may also heighten the audit risk for end-users as software companies try to recover from the crisis by initiating more audits of their customers. Having the appropriate knowledge, processes and tools to defend your organization with trustworthy data will help you avoid high penalties.

To increase audit resilience, consider:
• Performing frequent reconciliations of entitlements versus deployment for expensive software
• Leveraging technology tools to manage compliance in virtualized environments

Resiliency starts with a commitment to identify and mitigate risk factors that can further disrupt your business
Assessing your level of preparedness
As you evaluate your level of preparedness to address immediate opportunities and areas of risk, you can consider:

• Are your Cloud and SaaS licenses truly economical to your organization’s objectives in this novel environment?
• Do you have the trustworthy data and expertise to renegotiate your software contracts to your advantage?
• Do your internal resources have the time and expertise to address enterprise licensing optimization as they continue to work remotely and address other competing priorities?
