Workforce in the healthcare industry

Transcript

DAVID TYLER:
Tim, in Grant Thornton’s State of Work survey, mental health was mentioned as a real stressor in today’s economy and particularly in the healthcare industry. How do you balance the need for time off for mental health concerns when understaffing is already such a critical issue?

TIM GLOWA:
You know, Dave, that is such an interesting question. We’ve seen mental health rise significantly as a driver of stress for employers, which means it’s something that keeps employees up at night. It causes them to lose sleep, which, again, is probably contributing a problem if you’re not able to get a lot of sleep. This was kind of a middle-of-the-pack dimension when we surveyed it about six months ago. It’s now one of the top drivers of stress for healthcare workers. And the first thing – we are making progress here as a society and we are starting to recognize the importance of mental health and recognize that it is an illness just like any others, and it needs to be addressed. We can’t kind of keep it – we’re shining some light on it and I think that’s a wonderful, that’s a wonderful thing. Because everybody encounters stress and mental illness potentially at some point in their life. Giving time off is critical to prevent burnout. We know people, if they don’t have enough work-life balance, they don’t have enough rest, they don’t have enough time for themselves, we know that they’re not operating at peak performance. We know they’re not going to be engaged. When you have a healthcare worker who’s thinking about sleep or thinking about the stresses in their lives or their own challenges, they’re not operating at the top of their game. And they also may not be as likely to remain in the profession. We know through the pandemic that somewhere around a quarter to a third of frontline healthcare workers have considered leaving the profession.

DAVID TYLER:
I do think that it’s a little bit even more challenging in healthcare than other industries, because, as we’ve learned through the pandemic, many industries were able to scale operations down. Healthcare had to do the exact opposite. So, there’s no way that we can close operations effectively as a health system and a health enterprise in the United States. The thing that we can do is think about that strategically as well. One of the things that the merger game in healthcare has not done really well is service rationalization across multiple facilities. We’re going to do orthopedics here ... we’re going to do cardio here ... cardiac here ... we’re going to do cancer care at this facility. If we do that a little bit differently, we can kind of have a rolling close down of operations that still enables us to care for people in the community albeit in, maybe, a hospital a couple of miles further if you’re a multi-hospital system, but that’s something that we can think about that we haven’t done a particularly good job of as an industry.

TIM GLOWA:
And think just adding one last comment there too, is we have to make sure that we’re caring for the caregivers.

DAVID TYLER:
David, there’s no segment of the healthcare industry more affected by the shortages than nursing. There are estimates that an additional 1.2 million nurses are needed to replace those who are leaving this year. How must the industry respond and reset priorities to correct this?
Typically, we throw money at problems like this, and compensation is certainly part of the answer. We need to be fair. We need to have competitive compensation. That is absolutely the case. I do think, though, that one of the things that we sometimes overlook as people that wear suits instead of people that wear scrubs, is that people get into nursing and clinical care delivery out of the sense of altruism, the way to care for people. So we need to make compensation fair. We need to make the benefits interesting to make people feel appreciated and valued. But at the end of the day, we need to make sure that the work they do meets with the mission that they believe that they have to care for people. And if we don’t care for them, no amount of compensation, no amount of benefits tweaking are going to compensate for doing something that is not aligned with their values of wanting to take care of people.

Higher compensation is almost the new table stakes, right? And if you offer somebody more compensation and they don’t want it. I don’t know if you really want that worker anymore, right? Something’s not something’s not right. We have to look at ways to differentiate the value proposition with benefits that deliver more value, outsize value relative to the cost. There’s only one benefit and one total reward where the perceived value that an employee places on it equals its cost and that’s a salary change. If we were to offer any employee 10 grand in additional compensation, they’re going to value it at 10 grand. It’s going to cost the company at 10 grand. There are certain benefits -- health insurance in America is typically valued at about 70 cents on the dollar. But then there’s other benefits that potentially might have more leverage. And those are the ones where we might spend $1,000 or $5,000, but we get $7,000 or $8,000 in perceived value in the eyes of the employee. And those are the things that we really want to identify and address. And that’s why if we think again like a marketer, we can understand the needs and the frustrations of our target audience, of our employees -- understand what keeps them up at night. What cost-effective, on-brand solution could we offer as part of your benefits and your total rewards that would take that pain point away? Because if we can do that, we can then differentiate our offering in a really compelling way.

I think that’s a really compelling argument, Tim, because I do think that there are limits to throwing money at the problem. Again, to your point, hiring nurses from across the street that come over and hiring them back, and every time we do that, it’s a 10%, 15%, 17% pay increase -- at some point that becomes unsustainable. And I think we’re getting really, really close if we’re not there already.

First, traveling nurses are critically important today to make sure that we can keep facilities and units within those facilities operating at their peak capacity to serve the markets and the communities we get to serve. I will say that the original benefit of the bargain of traveling nurses was to allow people to travel. And now some of the benefit of the bargain of traveling nurses is they’re traveling across town, they’re traveling across the street, they’re traveling 40 minutes down the road. Not saying that “I’m going to spend the winter in Florida” or “I’m going to spend the summer in Idaho.” They’re really more of a day-to-day staffing management capability. And we talk to a lot of CEOs. Many of them are looking at the margins that are in place for nurse staffing companies and looking to either cut back on the ability for them to do local nurse rotations, or I’ve got several CEOs that are opening their own staffing companies so that they can manage the flow of that and pull the margin out of it and return that to actually care delivery. Or they’re looking at partnering with some specific folks to really address acute needs and not use them as a routine part of the staffing. But let’s make no mistake -- that industry is here to stay, and it’s incredibly valuable. But reducing the reliance on it is critical because you pay at a market premium. We have one organization that says they pay a quarter million dollars an hour, 24 hours a day, in additional staffing. But let’s be clear -- that is a day-to-day staffing management capability.

I think that’s a really compelling argument, Tim, because I do think that there are limits to throwing money at the problem. Again, to your point, hiring nurses from across the street that come over and hiring them back, and every time we do that, it’s a 10%, 15%, 17% pay increase -- at some point that becomes unsustainable. And I think we’re getting really, really close if we’re not there already.

David, what are some of the ways healthcare facilities can reduce their reliance on traveling nurse programs?

Tim, as always, good to talk to you. Thanks for the time. I appreciate the insights that we were able to get to today. I hope that you, as healthcare leaders across the country struggling with employee retention of clinical and non-clinical personnel, found the nugget of information that will be valuable to you as you try to serve the communities that you all live in.

“Grant Thornton” refers to the brand under which the Grant Thornton member firms provide assurance, tax and advisory services to their clients and/or refers to one or more member firms, as the context requires. Grant Thornton International Ltd (GTIL) and the member firms are not a worldwide partnership. GTIL and each member firm is a separate legal entity. Services are delivered by the member firms. GTIL does not provide services to clients. GTIL and its member firms are not agents of, and do not obligate, one another and are not liable for one another’s acts or omissions.

©2022 Grant Thornton LLP | All rights reserved | U.S. member firm of Grant Thornton International Ltd.